Kid-Approved Snowy Day Activities

Here are a few snowy day activities to keep children using their imaginations and working on sensory and large motor skills during the cold winter months.

Imagination Skills

- Grab some cardboard boxes and create! Let the imaginations flow, a box can be anything - a train, a ramp for toy cars, an airplane, or a house.

Sensory Skills

- Whipped cream is a wonderful indoor sensory activity for toddlers. Scoop some on a cookie sheet and let the children have fun. Do a little preparation, this activity can get messy.

Large Motor Skills

- Bowl indoors! Grab a soft kid-sized ball and set up a few items for pins (such as pop bottles and paper towel tubes).

- Put tape across a doorway. Throw balled up newspaper or cotton balls at the sticky side.

- Tape a line on the floor in different designs (zig zag, curvy or straight). Encourage the children to walk along the design, focusing on their balance. Now, have the children try walking backwards.

FAMILY FOCUS

Celebrating Unique Temperaments

Recognizing and reflecting on your own temperament and preferences is an important activity. Perhaps you enjoy always being on the go and thrive with constant stimulation – music, lights, and movement. Now, imagine what it might be like for a child that needs calm, soothing environments!

Flexible and Easy: Initiate communication about emotions. Model appropriate language to help children be more aware and understand their emotions. Remind them that their feelings are recognized and important. Encourage them to verbalize their needs with others. This might be as simple as telling a friend: "When Erika takes your doll, you can tell her "I'm playing with it, but you can have a turn when I'm done."

Feisty and Active: Be flexible and patient in your interactions. Provide opportunities for children to make choices. Encourage active play and allow for physical movements to expend high energy levels. Give plenty of advanced warning of schedule changes and consider giving them some type of leadership role, such as holding a timer or announcing the time to change. Acknowledge their feelings and point out when they are calm to help them recognize their emotions.

Fearful and Cautious: Set up the environment so things are in the same place. Stick to clear and predictable routines as much as possible. Provide additional preparation and support when changes in environment, situations, or people occur. Use pictures and language to remind children what will happen next. Encourage and support exploration and increasing independence. Support cautious children during a new experience by taking them to the activity, stepping back, remaining available and moving on.

Recognizing each child's unique temperament will allow you to adapt your approach to meet each child's needs! Certain strategies might be particularly impactful with certain temperament types. Here are a few common personalities and some strategies to support children in your care:

Overall, refrain from judging children's temperaments as a 'good' or 'bad' characteristics. Remember each child's personality contributes to a group/team in your child care program.
